Sixty-five-year-old Jonathan, who asked to be identified by a first name only, has already been an official asylum seeker for 27 years. After fleeing the war in Sri Lanka in 1983, he was imprisoned, tortured and sent on a death march, before eventually making his way to Australia. He was sent to Bronte Island in 2008, and now lives at the aged care facility in Calais. Asked about his experience, he pointed to the old asylum seeker, and laughed: "They all tell me, 'you are Australian. You are Australian.' And I say, 'no, I am not an Australian. I have come here as a refugee. I have been an asylum seeker. I cannot go back to my country, there is war there, and the police are shooting my fellow Tamils.'" "There are no Tamils here. The refugees all live separately." He said it wasn't long ago that the boat made its way to British shores. "I was at the refugee camp in Calais, and I was told that there will be a boat. I could not sleep, so I told the man that I want to go back to the UK. But, when the boat came, they took us to this camp. The boat could take 30 people, but there were nearly 300 of us." One of the most heartbreaking stories was of a Sri Lankan boy named Seelan. His mother had no family in Sri Lanka, so he had no one to look after him. A decision was made to separate him from his mother, and take him to a refugee camp. "I am so sad," he said, "I miss my mother. She looked after me well. She always sung to me and gave me food, and now I am in a room and that is all." "He didn't eat anything for three days," Jonathan said, tears forming Dilemmas in career decision making: how college students perceive academic and nonacademic factors. This study explored the influence of academic and nonacademic factors on the career decisions of college students. Participants were college freshmen enrolled in a single advanced academic program ($n = 22$; Mage = 19.09 yr., SD = 1.05) or a single vocational program ($n = 28$; Mage = 19.21 yr., SD = 1.33). They were asked to indicate how influential each of 20 possible major and minor criteria was in their career decision making. Furthermore, they were asked to select from a list of three different lifestyle approaches for each kind of career. Factor analysis of the responses revealed the existence of four distinct scales: 1) academic, 2) occupational, 3) lifestyle, and 4) nonacademic. The results were the following. 1) On the academic scale, the importance of future job promotion and the desire to work in one's field were the main criteria in the academic programs. In the vocational programs, a desire for independence and a need for independence were the main criteria in the occupational scale. 2) On the nonacademic scale, the desire for harmony and a need for individuality were the main criteria in the lifestyle scale. The academic and nonacademic factors play different roles in the career decisions of college students. Of the two, the academic factor is more influential than the nonacademic factor. The vocational program seems to result in an independent lifestyle, whereas the advanced academic program appears to result in a harmonious lifestyle.

In the press Fields were also growing again in Kent, Hampshire and Buckinghamshire. Environment Agency chief executive Barbara Young said: "We need to get back on top of this flooding cycle. They're very different disasters - where some of the agricultural land is crucial for farming, as is the case in Berkshire, and others where the environment is threatened and the local economy relies on tourism and fishing. "The scale of the damage being caused is unprecedented. "We're in the middle of a problem that's been building for years. "We hope that the Government steps up to the mark and supports
