metasploitforwindows32bitdownload A: It just means you're using them, not replacing them. A: In a normal log configuration, stdout or stderr is redirected to a file, by using the `2>file` or `2>>file` syntax. This means that you're actually going to keep logging both to the file, and to screen, but the file will be the one that will be cleared regularly. If you want to fix it, you should edit `/etc/rsyslog.conf` to add this line: `if $programname == 'rotate' then auth,authpriv.*?4? /var/log/swift-rotate.log .?4? /var/log/swift-rotate.log` This makes it clear that the logfile is the one cleared regularly. If you want to redirect both to the screen and the log file, then you need to do this in

2 steps: if $programname == 'rotate' then auth,authpriv.*?4? /var/log/swift-rotate.log .?4?
/var/log/swift-rotate.log 2>&1 UPDATE: As pointed out by @mcbreak in the comments, for a more elegant solution you can use the $Action variable.
It contains the complete action taken in this section of the configuration. You can use the $Action-on-match variable as a pattern, and it will be used to parse your log configuration. In your case, this should work: if $programname == 'rotate' then auth,authpriv.*?4? /var/log/swift-rotate.log .?4? /var/log/swift-rotate.log 2>&1 This works for any file or directory (including both files, and directories of directories) that have the $Action-on-match variable set to rotation. UPDATE 2: As pointed out by @Davison, it is better to have the log written to the file in a Metasploitforwindows32bitdownload As there are minimal GUI options available for metasploitforwindows32bitdownload. And some users need to use other methods. I don't think it's there, though, that's why I gave the solution to another potential issue. On the one hand, you could try resetting the network connection. On the other, the only possible solution that I could think of (though I haven't tested it) was to unplug the Ethernet and plug it back in (which would most likely make it simply connect to an available network). Thanks again. Michael On Sun, 13 Jan
