1. Open an image that you'd like to edit. If you're a beginner, look for a sample image that you'd like to alter. If you're an intermediate or professional user, it's best to have a photo that contains a subject or subjects you want to photograph. This improves your success if you're not specifically trying to photograph a subject. 2. Create a new, blank image in the File > New menu. The program calls this image the `_working_image`. The new image is one of two that Photoshop creates, the default being the `_light source_image`. After you set the working image as the foreground image, you can switch to any of the other background images in order to see what they look like without the subject in the image. 3. Create a new, blank image in the File > New menu. The program calls this image the `_background_image`, which it stores. The default is to use a layer from the working image for the background, as it contains the subject you may want to photograph. When you switch to a background image, it becomes the new foreground image. The working image is the first of two that Photoshop creates when you open a new image, the second being the background image. The working image is called the `_foreground_image` while the background image is the `_background_image`. It's important to keep these names straight. 4. Switch to the background image. Click the Background tab on the top of the window. The image appears on a background layer. When you start any Photoshop editing task, you can switch to the background image at any time to see what the background will look like. 5. Click the Window menu. 6. Choose Duplicate (You can also press `Shift+Ctrl+N/Option+Ctrl+N`.) You can select either a rectangular or elliptical selection area by using the Rectangular Selection or Elliptical Selection tool and then click to create your selection. Be sure you're in the Background image layer, or you won't see the selection. 7. Use the Rectangular Selection tool to select the area to be cut away from the background, leaving the subject or subjects you want to photograph.

[Preparation and transfection of siRNA/cationic liposome-based nanoparticles]. To develop cationic liposome-based nanoparticles (CLB-NPs) as a novel non-viral gene delivery system for inducing apoptosis of various types of tumor cells. The CLB-NPs were prepared by mixing of cationic liposomes and siRNA in the presence of polyethylenimine (PEI). The morphology and size distribution of the CLB-NPs were observed by using a transmission electron microscope (TEM) and dynamic light scattering (DLS) analysis. The lipid quantity on the CLB-NPs was tested by the phosphatidyl serine (PS) assay. The transfection capacity was determined by the fluorescence intensity of GFP-expressing MDA-MB-435 cells. The expression of GFP at the mRNA and protein levels was observed in the MDA-MB-435 cells after cationic liposome-based nanoparticles-mediated gene delivery. The CLB-NPs was obtained successfully. The size of the CLB-NPs ranged from 106.8 to 215.5 nm. The PS content of the CLB-NPs was 19.35 approximately 26.22%. The transfection rate was 60% approximately 90% in the GFP-expressing MDA-MB-435 cells. The GFP expression in the MDA-MB-435 cells was observed with laser confocal scanning microscope. Cationic liposome-based nanoparticles are useful vehicles for siRNA delivery to cancer cells. Effect of foot orthoses on balance in children with cerebral palsy: a systematic review and meta-analysis. Cerebral palsy (CP) is a movement disorder caused by damage to the developing brain during the fetal or perinatal period that limits motor skills. Children with CP experience varying levels of foot and ankle plantarflexor spasticity and the lower extremities are often abducted from the pelvis. Foot orthoses have been shown to improve balance, but the effectiveness of foot orthoses compared to no intervention has not been systematically evaluated. We conducted a systematic review and meta-analysis to evaluate the effectiveness of foot orthoses on balance in children with CP. Studies were included if they included (1) participants diagnosed with CP, (2) foot orthoses as an intervention, and (3) at least 1 measure of postural control.
